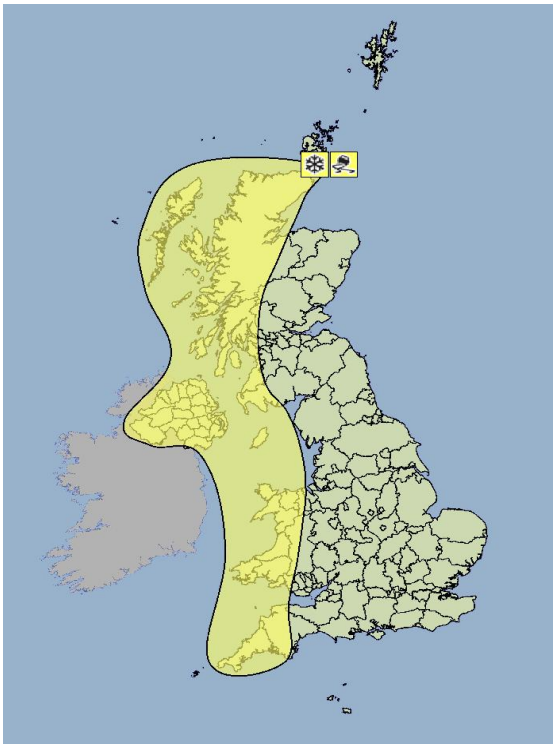
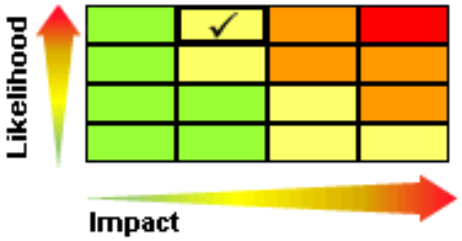
National Severe Weather Warning Service





Chief Forecasters Assessment
Further showers of snow, sleet and hail will affect western parts of the UK, these frequent in western Scotland and the north of Northern Ireland, where thunder is also possible. 1-3 cm of snow may accumulate at low levels inland, and perhaps 5-10 cm on hills above 200m. Showers will gradually fade overnight Tuesday into Wednesday, with icy stretches developing as skies clear, particularly where earlier snow has partly melted.

As is usually the case with showers, some places will miss them, while some coastal fringes may see rain or hail.

The Met Office have issued a Yellow Warning of Snow and Ice

Valid from 11:00 on Tue, 06th Feb 2018 until 10:00 on Wed, 07th Feb 2018

Sleet, snow and hail showers, some heavy, will affect western areas through the rest of Tuesday and at first tonight, with icy stretches forming overnight.

This update removes the warning from northwest England where fewer wintry showers now seem likely.

Some transport disruption is possible, with longer journey times and delays to public transport. Icy patches are likely to develop on some untreated roads, pavements and cycle paths, leading to an increased risk of injuries and accidents.
